

Life Stinks

without the Roadless Rule

The Roadless Area Conservation Rule protects America's National Forests, the quality of our air, water and lives. But, the Bush Administration isn't defending the rule, they're gutting it. They want to exempt Alaska's Tongass and Chugach National Forests from the Roadless Rule. And, they want to allow governors to seek state exemptions—all to reward corporate special interests that want to log, mine and drill on our last remaining wild forests. That stinks. And so will life without the Roadless Rule.

Upholding America's roadless rule would be a breath of fresh air.
